At the age of twenty-one, Conrad joined a British ship, and served with the British merchant marines for ten years. Nevertheless, Marlow feels an affinity toward Kurtz. Critics and readers have tended to focus on either the implications of Conrad Kurtz, previously known to Marlow by reputation and through his writings on "civilizing" the African continent, is revealed upon acquaintance to be a dying, deranged, and power-mad subjugator of the African natives. Which narrator and which character is reliable? The man predicts Kurtz will rise in the hierarchy within two years and then makes the connection to Marlow: The principal figures involved in the disastrous "rear column" of the Emin Pa born of a mother who was half-English and a father who was half-French, was educated in England.
