In addition to their domestic agenda, through which they hoped to influence their respective national governments to enact laws that would bring women into civil and legal equity with men, the feminists active at the inter-American congresses took strong stands on international issues, supporting the principles of nonintervention, the resolution of conflict through arbitration, and the rights of small nations. They are meant only for a single reading, as intimate confidences shared with another friend. As mothers of the nation, they are precariously other to the nation.

Instead, the women in the novels written by men of the time were depicted as uncontrollable. The original members of the commission were, in effect, self-appointed. Expanding the range of novels to include popular fiction exposes attitudes toward the changing social structure and the changing role of women during this period. Its goal, then, was to produce an autonomous female subject, one that escapes is well illustrated in the subsequent history of the women's platform. Moreover, Latin American female intellectuals were particularly alienated from politics as practiced within their countries, excluded from leadership positions by the forces of opposition as well as by their governments.
