Masahiro does not even need to participate in the conflict: That's perhaps when the fun can really begin – reengineering The Phoenix Strategy whole new bird without having to put your company on life support to achieve it. As Grasp must be in play before it can be used, your opponent will be forewarned. I really don't like cards with all of those traits, as they can be a waste, or at least a waste of time. If you are just getting started in business rules, it offers a great way to show direct value and ROI from your initiative, and to gain valuable experience and credibility, all within a The Phoenix Strategy, relatively narrow scope. Earning just that little bit more lets you extend your board state and give you more options from your Conflict hand. So based on my opinion of the clan's strength, let me posit some possible decks. Ring play – In the core, there's a shugenja that keys off each element. On the application side, the monolithic legacy has become slightly less monolithic.
