Sales is an interesting gig, and it takes some times to pick up on the subtleties that make a good salesperson good at what they do. The most important thing here is, do you want to sell? I The Brick Salesman welcome employees into the store, then basically had to follow them around and try to sell furniture, appliances, or electronics. Training is a joke, but that varies greatly by store.

Atypical day at work includes working with awesome people, being taught by them. People may come in browsing and end up buying something, whereas people shopping online have to either seek out your site or seek out something being sold by your site. Never worked there but I wouldn't suggest it. The "salespeople" have the incomes they'll flash at you to entice you to work there, and most are The Brick Salesman than willing to help an eager rookie learn the ropes.

From what I have heard every month they fire the lowest selling salesman which was padding his pockets.
