She never gave us the details over. A case of mistaken identity, the freedom found in not being yourself, and love at first sight with the most impossible candidate for marriage possible all wound together to create a fun story that left me closing the book with a big smile on my face.

Recommended for mature audiences. It was a good read! He drags the charade on and on and on and on all while denying he has feelings for. She calms down a little, however, when she realizes he lives in a Really Nice House. The central conceit was stretched past the point of breaking, to the point where I found both main characters fairly idiotic.
